

This volume brings together scholars of ancient religion, classics, and the Near East to explore how »falsely« attributing texts functioned to situate writers in larger literary and historical conversations, as well as to influence the interpretation and reception of a text.